Excerpt: .of the ancient Hindus-- Come, never mind the antiquities; we will have them another time. Let us hear your own adventures now. Well, I had just rounded this point when one of my men called out most vehemently, Look, sir, look; there is a tiger! My eyes were instantly turned in the direction towards which he pointed, and there I saw a most fearful sight. A man was tearing, springing, bounding towards the river, and a hundred yards behind him followed a large panther, pursuing him with those rapid leaps for which that animal is so famous. I instantly ordered my people to pull towards the shore, in the hope of rescuing the panting wretch who thus struggled for his life. Before we reached the bank the man had made a bound into the water, and stood immersed up to his neck. I suppose he was too much exhausted to swim, for we could hardly hear his voice as he called to us to make haste. At this instant I saw the dark blunt snout of an enormous alligator rising slowly above the surface, as he made his way towards his intended victim. I shouted to the man, Crocodile! crocodile! He heard me, hesitated an instant, then rushed back to the bank. This sudden movement disconcerted the panther, vho started back a few paces, and the next moment our boat shot within reach. Come hither, I exclaimed. The man made a spring; the panther...
