The end of continued practice would be the automatic coordination of visual impression and finger impulse, into which all types would merge. (6) Controlled Reaction The Controlled Reaction involves further interpolated mental process between stimulus and reaction, namely the referring of the stimulus to one of the classes which determines the choice of the reacting movement. It has been used in Jastrow s1 laboratory under the name of Classification Time ; 10 monosyllabic words of each of the three grammatic classes, nouns, verbs, and adjectives, were used in irregular order as stimuli. Our test (see p. 77) follows Mimsterberg in using as stimuli the names of poets, philosophers, statesmen, scientists, and musicians. Both of these researches, however, used the cbronoscope for measuring the individual reactions, while we used the stop-watch (except in the case of Cr. who reacted as rapidly as possible to the successive stimuli). In this reaction there were five coordinations between classname and fingers, but the class-name could be got only by classifying the stimulus; as, Newton, scientist--4th finger ; Mozart, musician--fifth finger ; etc. The variability of processes may be indicated by the following classification of methods: (a) The auditory impression of the name may be followed by a kinaesthetic image of the movement in the appropriate finger for the class to which the name belongs; and, as a result of practice, by a kinaesthetic impression from incipient movement in the finger, and later by the impulse of the finger...
