Man s golden age is in the future.--Poetry and mythology are wont to represent the earliest age of man s abode upon the earth as one of purity and innocence, of prosperity and peace, a time when he lived in perfect happiness on the fruits of the unfilled earth, suffered no bodily infirmity, passed away in a gentle sleep, and became after his demise a guardian daemon of this world. All this is nothing more than gloss, 1 an air-hung mirage over sterile desert sands. The ideal of our humanity is painted not on the crumbling walls of the past but on the fresh clean canvas of the future. We must look not backward but forward for man s best and happiest lot. Just as the astronomer can predict the future state of the heavens, so the sociologist can foresee that division of...
