Excerpt: . . . civilization and the Crescent--the spiritual fervor was at a loss where to vent its fury; the national mind, missing its accustomed recreation, turned its forces wherever the sanctity of the Cross was to be upheld, and found employment under Cardinal Ximenes, in a campaign against the Moors of Northern Africa, or, later still, against Solyman the Magnificent, in Hungary, and the crushing of Protestantism in Germany. But this was not enough for the occupation of all the turbulent spirits to which eight centuries of warfare had given birth. They sighed for a wider field, and as if destiny had fixed the proper moment, the ships of Columbus brought back the tidings of the wonderful New World which was to become a curse to Spain, of the vast fields which were open for the planting of the Cross and the propagation of the faith. The stories of untold treasures to be gained there expanded like wave ripples, and pandering to the cupidity of the mind linked its two most powerful forces, religion and avarice. The brain of Spain became a vast crucible in which the fiery Spanish imagination melted down the wealth of the New World and threw its power into the religious idea that still swayed the nation. The conquest of Mexico by Oortez, the boldest filibustero of his time, and the overthrow of the Empire of the Incas by his cousin, Pizarro, with the tide of treasure which immediately poured into Spain, inflamed...
