The United States intervention in Somalia in 1992, on humanitarian grounds, is very relevant today as we witness the events unfolding in Iraq, Syria and Turkey. The Kurds, a people without a homeland, is also central to the problem that seem insolvable at this time. In the current situation the U. S involvement is not altogether altruistic. There is genuine concern to protect this country and its people from the threat posed by those who would destroy our way of life. This does not, of course, take away from a desire to render humanitarian assistance to those in need. In the Somali context, the United States intervention was implemented to alleviate the suffering of the Somali people. In the end, the intervention failed because of bureaucratic ineptitude on the part of the International Community. The U. S military was tasked with the responsibility of bringing some level of stability to a war torn country. However the mission failed because the equipment the military needed to carry out its mandate was refused by the bureaucrats in Washington. Tony Dillet is on a humanitarian mission with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) in Somalia in 1992-1993. It is an extremely dangerous assignment. The civil war that ended in January 1991, left a vacuum in which anarchy reigned supreme. The population is being decimated by a famine that would eventually claim the lives of some 350, 000 Somalis. The United Nations Security Council establishes the United Nations Office in Somalia (UNOSOM) in April 1992. Pakistani Peacekeepers form part of UNOSOMs mandate and try to stem the violence, but are unable to do so. Just before leaving office, President George H W Bush intervenes...
