Excerpt from Report of Eighth Dry Bean Research Conference, Bellaire, Michigan, August 11-13, 1966 From a chapter written by R. F. A. Dean of Uganda for a book which I edited some years ago, the statement that legumes will present one of the most important sources of protein for the future and their utilization must dominate any discussion of man's use of plant proteins, might well Open this discussion. I became further intrigued with legumes when I ran into the speculation on how ancient American civilizations developed. The story goes that as long as the major source of food was corn, large urban populations could not form and survive, because there was insufficient protein to supply their needs. But when beans came into the agricultural pattern, then corn and beans together made for an adequate diet and permitted large concentrations of people so necessary to sustain a high culture. Legumes remain a major source of protein throughout the world. It is estimated that humans consume million tons of protein annually from legumes as compared to 40 million tons from cereals and...
