It was in the last quarter of the seventeenth century, that the Count Adrian von Oberfeldt chanced to be at the fair of Leipzig. He was there, not for purposes of business, nor directly of pleasure; but to unite, with the dissipating, a certain portion of time, the chance of meeting, in the crowded and bustling scene, some object or adventure which might give him that excitation, the want of which made his time so heavy on his hands. Oberfeldt was a person very different from the race of Thondertentroncks, then so common in his country - he had had advantages which few of them possessed, and his natural...
