Brand New Book  Print on Demand . *Includes pictures *Includes online resources and a bibliography for further reading To possess and develop western North America became a high priority for the United States government even before its constitution had been complete. For President Thomas Jefferson, the vast terrain of plains, mountains, and extensive coastlines offered both long-term prosperity and protection from competing international powers. To take ownership of the continent s natural resources and establish ports on both coasts from which to trade products with the world was alluring to several European powers as well. Spain contested the land to the south, following exploration of present-day Florida, and France was heavily invested in what was to become large tracts of eastern Canada. Britain was eager to erect forts and trading posts along the Pacific, thanks to the earlier efforts of Captain John Cooke, who had explored much of the Pacific coast. Early in the 19th-century, crossings such as the Lewis and Clark Expedition and John Jacob Astor s first business ventures in the Northwest demonstrated the impracticality of traversing the hostile environment for the common citizen but solidified Jefferson s claim on the land. Railroads were still some decades off, and passable roads were all but non-existent. From its first interactions with numerous Indian cultures, the government understood that the western portion of the continent was already owned by a variety of indigenous tribes, despite their alternate concept of ownership. To gain possession of the coasts and the interior meant there would be new languages to be learned, hundreds of treaties to be struck, and wars to be fought over several regions. No familiar institutions of power were suitable for creating a foothold in the continent...
