Early diagnosis is possible with Laboratory aid, and this aid is within the reach of every Vermont doctor. 2. Two or more cases of typhoid fever in a small rural village at the same time calls for investigation. Such an investigation should include, (a) drinking water, (b) milk, (c) all articles of food eaten raw, especially oysters. Modern research has busied itself with this disease, and among the truths it has unearthed are these: typhoid fever is not providential; its presence in a community means that the victim has swallowed the bacillus typhosus; that this bacillus has originated in a prior case. It follows logically that typhoid cases have been poisoned by the excreta of other typhoid cases. The story of this Mill River Valley outbreak shows that these other prior cases are not always easy of detection, and that the rehearsal of the above trite...
