Excerpt: .of the Lotus given, Yet, worn by watching, round those orbs of light A blackness gathered like the shades of night. She cooled her dry lips in the bubbling stream, And lived on Amrit from the pale moon-beam, Sometimes in hunger culling from the tree The rich ripe fruit that hung so temptingly. Scorched by the fury of the noon-tide rays, And fires that round her burned with ceaseless blaze, Summer passed o'er her--rains of Autumn came And thoroughly drenched the Lady's tender frame, So steams the earth, when mighty torrents pour On thirsty fields all dry and parched before. The first clear rain-drops falling on her brow, Gem it one moment with their light, and now Kissing her sweet lip find a welcome rest In the deep valley of the Lady's breast; Then wander broken by the fall within The mazy channels of her dimpled skin. There as she lay upon her rocky bed, No sumptuous roof above her gentle head, Dark Night, her only witness, turned her eyes, Red lightnings flashing from the angry skies, And gazed upon her voluntary pain, In wind, in sleet, in thunder, and in rain. Still lay the Maiden on the cold damp ground, Though blasts of winter hurled their snows around, Still pitying in her heart the mournful fate Of those poor birds, so fond, so desolate, Doomed, hapless pair, to list each other's moan Through the long hours of night, sad...
