Expedients of the British to procure Andre s Liberation.--Their Failure.--Correspondence in the Case. jJAULUS HOOK was only separated from New York by the Hudson, and was almost opposite Clinton s head-quarters. The papers brought by Ogden were therefore not long in coming to his hand; and he at once summoned Mr. Smith the King s Chief-Justice of New York, Mr. John Tabor Kempe the Attorney-General, and other civilians, to meet in consultation with his general officers. Having stated the circumstances of the case and submitted Washington s letter, Sir Henry asked Smith whether in his opinion the Americans could hang Andre as a spy. The chief-justice said that a reference to the authorities on the question led him to believe they could not; and in this opinion the officers concurred. But Kempe preserving a silence, one of them put the same query to him. Without going into the law of the matter he curtly answered, I think they will hang him. The querist turned away in disgust, and the Attorney-General presently retired. The conclusion arrived at by the council, however, was that as the American board could not have been possessed of full evidence in the business, a deputation should proceed forthwith to our lines, armed with satisfactory proofs of Andre s innocence: and that Washington should be notified by return of his own flag of the coming envoys. So soon as Andre s imprisonment was known, Simcoe had put himself...
