Excerpt from The Romance of Engineering The remarkable and rapid development of modern engineering has brought many of its more dramatic phases into public light. Artists, both with pen and pencil, have made use of the opportunities offered, and stories have been written and pictures painted in which the central feature of the composition is some engineering creation, either of fact or of imagination. Many of Kiplings stories, as for example The Bridge Builders and . 007, are striking bits of romance, with singular truthfulness of detail, in the field of modern engineering, and Pennells sketches of the Panama Canal throw a new and most interesting light on that great work. The subject of this afternoons talk is not, however, modern engineering, except in so far as it is a development, just as every human activity must be, out of the inspiration and the efforts of men of past ages, but rather a glimpse at two or three periods of history of which there is record of engineering endeavor. An interesting factor, at once suggested by these considerations, is that of time, and...
