A second division, constituted precisely as was appointed under the previous constitutional provision, would not at this time be practicable without greatly interfering with, and to a very considerable extent destroying, the efficiency of the Supreme Court, both in the appellate branch and in the first instance, since the Supreme Court is organized in such a manner at this time as to do its most effective work and bring about what is regarded as the best results in that respect. Anything in the way of designation of justices of the Supreme Court, exclusively so as to form a second division, would, therefore, necessarily, be such an interference...
