Excerpt from Louisiana Conservationist, Vol. 33: July August, 1981 To the alligator hunter, his job is serious business, hard work that converts to livelihood one month out of the year. To the sport hunter, his experience is unlike taking any other game species. To the state of Louisiana, gator harvesting is a management scheme that supplies sustained yield of a renewable natural resource. Louisiana gator management is probably one of the world's most successful wildlife management stories. The first settlers in the southwest Louisiana marshlands were attracted by the abundant natural resources: gators, fur animals, waterfowl, and fish. They lived in the marsh on dry ridges called cheniers, traveled by boat, and made their living from hunting, fishing, and trapping. Gator hunting had long been a way of life until hard times and overhunting lowered gator population numbers in the early 60s to such an extent that the season was closed.
