Sir William Erskine, knt. and John Meldrum, esq erected alighthouse on this point in the 16th century. Lately there have been two lights, one produced by the burning of coals, the other by oil. In 1665, in consequence of the encroachments made by the sea on the cliffs, several large bones were found. One of these, weighing 57 pounds, was supposed by the faculty of that time to be human. Turning towards the right to rejoin the road, we arrive at Hemesby. This was part of a large capital manor in the Conquerors time, and was granted to Bishop Beaufoe, who left it to his successors. In the sixth year of William de Claxton, prior of Norwich, a court was held by him, when it was found by the homage that it was the custom of this manor, on...
