Dr. Dunton cited as a practical solution of the problem the experiment practiced in Canada, where fully equipped vocation schools were established in the convalescent hospitals, making it possible for the crippled soldier to get at least a rudimentary grasp of some vocation by the time he was able to leave the hospital. In view of the fact that many soldiers will be so badly disabled that they will not be able to move around, Dr. Dunton said that steps should be taken by the society to ascertain just what form of work could be done at home to change the crippled soldier from an economic loss into an economic asset. Manufacturers and all employers in the non-ferrous and electroplating lines would do well to give this...
