I have not spoken of the mighty masses of ignorance still untouched. In following my rapid sketch of this movement--the kindling of an enthusiastic love of knowledge on the part of Hindu youth--the establishing of colleges and schools in so many of the cities and villages throughout the whole land--if, in listening to this account, any of my hearers are inclined to infer--surely education has accomplished its mission in India, the millions of that land must now be becoming nearly as well educated as our own people, then it becomes my duty to guard you against such misapprehension. And to do this I need but mention the fact that, taking the whole population of the Bombay Presidency where your American educators first began this work, and where it has been most ably followed by other missionaries and by government,...
