Excerpt: . and further back, we shall at last reach a period when kw alone, and not k pure, existed. 61.--(a) It will have been seen from the preceding sections (55-60, and the notes) that scarcely any philological problem can have given occasion to more diverse and hostile opinions than that involving the genealogy and relationship of the various I-E. A-sounds. If to those opinions I here venture to add one more, it is because I have grounds for thinking that some of the principles enunciated in the former part of this treatise will enable me to attack the problem upon a totally different side from any towards which previous inquirers have advanced. I must remark at the outset that the ethnic question, involving the relationship of the Lithu-Slaves to the Aryans on the one side and to the rest of the Europeans on the...
