Excerpt: the seasonal differences between EEB rates and evaporation rates computed by other methods suggests that there are biasing factors in the methods. They could be in the energybudget method of computation, in the instrument records, in the mass-transfer theory or calibration, in the seepage effect, or in some other phenomenon. Several sources of error probably exist. During the springtime periods (Nos. 18-21, 45, 46), when energy-budget rates are lower than other results, the EB data cannot be considered to be so accurate as those from other methods. In other cases such as periods 23 and 24, when one of two sequential periods is lower and the other is higher than data from other methods, it seems that an error in Qx values could have come from inaccuracies in the thermal survey. By majority rule, it appears that EEB data in the fall tend to be about 0.05 cm day⁻¹ too low. Winter energy budgets are useless for computing evaporation because radiation reflectivity from ice is not know, Qx is greatly dependent upon accurate icethickness measurements, and the Bowen-ratio concept is questionable. Mass transfer. Evaporation rates computed by the mass-transfer method were within the ranges of rates computed by other methods during about three-fourths of the computation periods (fig. 30). They tended to be higher than rates from other methods during April, May, and November and to be lower than other rates during June and July. The periods when mass-transfer rates were higher than others had evaporation...
