Excerpt from Sugar Canes and Their Products: Culture and Manufacture There is another point worthy of study. It is what might vulgarly be termed the path of empire. The development of trade centers, like centers of population, is determined by definite causes. So far we have seen one sugar-mart grow to the exclusion of others. New Orleans, Baltimore, Philadelphia. And Boston have each enjoyed special advantages, but New York has far outstripped all. Now, it is reasonable to expect one or more additional trade-centers to rise into prominence with the growth of such a large country. If raw-sugars continue to be imported, San Francisco has the most promising future. If domestic cultivation of sugar yielding plants is destined to supply a fair portion of our wants, no city is better located to secure a leading position than St. Louis. Even her neighbors and rivals in other branches of trade will concede that this conclusion is well founded. But, turning from what may seem a side-path, the question of the ability of the world to dispose of the increasing product of the...
