However, two decades after World War II, as the nation shifted from an industrial to a postindustrial (or postmaterialist) society (Vig and Kraft: 9), national environmental groups have redefined their societal position. Organisations that had started as sometimes lose associations of anglers, hikers or birdwatchers, like the Sierra Club or the National Audobon Society, now formulated political stances taking into account a globalising world; after sometimes narrow-minded Not in my backyard projects and local initiatives of all kinds now consciousness for global issues like rain forest deforestation and climate warming arose. Preservation became environmentalism. (.) Also the scholar Rik Scarce reports skyrocketing membership figures in the...
