Lisa Johnson, United States, 2015. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Many people think there is nothing logical about God because God requires faith, whereas logic requires strict principles of validity. Remarkably, both statements are true. It does require faith to believe in God and logic does require strict principles of validity which do not lend themselves well to making the case for the existence of the kind of God we have been told to believe in. That god requires a huge leap of faith and makes a mockery of strict principles of validity. However, there is one tiny problem with the god we have been told to believe in. He does not exist. The god we have been told to believe in is not the God the Bible s Old Testament prophets describe, nor is he the God Jesus very clearly discusses in his teachings. That is the only God I know and have faith in and that is the God for which I make the logical case in this book based on science, Jesus and the Bible. I am able to make the logical case for God because God is the label we have given to a universal consciousness of creation that relies on logical principles and rules in order to create. The fields of math and science have and are revealing these universal laws of nature to us and although we may not consciously be aware of it, we use them daily in creating patterns of thought that either promote our health and well-being or destroy it. What I discovered is that we can never really know the true (what the Bible refers to as our consciousness of good) without likewise knowing the false (what the Bible refers to as...
