THE DEVIL AND THE OLD MAN Up away north, in the old days, in Chester, there was a man who never throve. Nothing he put his hand to ever prospered, and as his state worsened, his friends fell away, and he grew desperate. So one night when he was alone in his room, thinking of the rent due in two or three days and the money he couldn t scrape together, he cried out, I wish I could sell my soul to the devil like that man the old books tell about. Now just as he spoke the clock struck twelve, and, while it chimed, a sparkle began to burn about the room, and the air, all at once, began to smell of brimstone, and a voice said: Will these terms suit you? He then saw that some one had just placed a parchment there. He picked it up and read it through; and being in despair, and not knowing what he was doing, he answered, Yes, and looked round for a pen. Take and sign, said the voice again, but first consider what it is you do; do nothing rashly. Consider. So he thought awhile; then Yes he said, I ll sign, and with that he groped for the pen. Blood from your left thumb and sign, said the voice. So he pricked his left thumb and signed. Here is your earnest money, said the voice, nine and twenty silver pennies. This...
