Excerpt: . . . VII INFANT MORTALITY MY DEAR SIR, --To those who ardently long to see Egypt great and prosperous, more deeply imbued with the soundness and importance of her destiny even than is the case at the present time, the consciousness must come with peculiar sadness that there is a damaging lacuna in the ordering of the domestic life of her people. Unfortunately the brilliant searchlight of public opinion, which is the prime stimulus to reform, is often diverted by an awkward angle of gross ignorance, prejudice, carelessness, or general indifference to the subject, from an evil which may not in its present operation cause the social picture to suffer from the point of view of the superficial observer, but which none the less exists, and maybe is all the more dangerous from its sinister and hidden working. The Egyptian people are pre-eminently susceptible to teaching, as has been demonstrated times without number during the past few decades, but the habits of centuries cannot be modified without that teaching and initiative on the part of others; and in so far as concerns the alarming death-rate among children, and the spread of disease, how little has been done! The British nation may glance back with justifiable pride at the great work of Lord Cromer and his coadjutors in the Administration, and reckon that the commendation accorded in that quarter has been well deserved; but it would be a grave mistake indeed to imagine that the policy which...
