Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1911 edition. Excerpt: . . . as planes flying through the air. In no case should the planes deflect the air upwards. Any action deflecting the air up must have a reaction forcing the plane down. A form of blade shown in Fig. 17 is therefore bad for a flying plane; so also is that shown in Fig. 18. Both of them cause an upward deflection, as shown by the stream-lines. These bad forms have what is called a dipping front edge. It has repeatedly been claimed that such a bad form gives a greater lift when the plane is held in a moving current of air and not allowed to move horizontally. But it has never been proved that this form gives a greater lift on a plane flying through still air, and that is the condition under which planes act in flying-machines. The dipping front edge is not very prominent in the best examples of flying-machines which Fig. 18. have been used to win the large prizes, while none of them with pronounced dipping edges have ever flown at all with success. The best curve in practice seems to be pretty near that shown in Fig. 19. The three straight sides of the triangle of the plane--ab the base, be the perpendicular, and ac the plane--are shown. Taking ac as a chord, the curve is given by the abscissa, showing the curve of the under face of the plane; the upper curve is made so that the plane is...
