There is no branch of art in which it is possible to do good work without study and experience; but there is a great difference in difficulty between various branches, and the amateur is, as a rule, more successful in Flower, Fruit, and Still Life painting than in anything else, because these are the simplest, and require the least amount of knowledge. Of the three, Flower painting is the most difficult, because flowers alter more or less all the time that they are being painted, shifting their position, changing color, opening, closing, or wilting; while many kinds of fruit, and all still life remain exactly the same. By still life are meant glass, pottery, bric-a-brac, and other manufactured articles. Vegetables and nuts may be considered as belonging to the same class as fruit, while fish and game are animals. Flowers are very frequently combined, in pictures, with still life and drapery, and the flower painter must, therefore, know how to paint the latter two, which will seem comparatively simple to him after he understands the former. As was said in the Introduction, the instruction given here will be for painting flowers by means of moderately wet washes placed upon dry paper; a method that gives a more realistic, crisp effect than that of painting upon a continuously wet surface. The originals of all the little flower headings and tail-pieces in this book were painted upon dry paper. In order to paint anything well,...
