Is there any other cure for wrong thinking, or remedy for false sentiment, than the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ? Atticus G. Haygood. Oxford, Ga. AN ADVENTURE IN VENICE. Chapter I. Five days I had spent in Venice. In that short period an industrious sight-seer may visit many points of interest; but if he depends upon the highly colored stories of the average professional who pilots him through the memorials of a thousand years of history, he will know but little about the marble palaces and wonders of the City in the Sea. Of course I was acquainted with the record which this grand old commonwealth has made, and the impressions of many storied volumes were recalled as I stood face to face with the mute witnesses of the glorious past. The Doge s palace, the Bridge of Sighs, Galileo s famous observatory, the wonderful clock, and the great church which contains the contributions of half of Asia in its treasury, all of these I had carefully examined, having a guide of exceptional intelligence, and wholly occupied by attentions to myself. The season was midsummer, and few strangers visit Venice in August. To me it was the one opportunity of a lifetime, and I made the most of it. I had finished and posted my letters to America. The Hotel Vittoria was as quiet as a churchyard, and from my room I could...
