Accordingly the argument presumes throughout that the Reader has perused that work. Ethics without psychology is empty: without Metaphysics it cannot be Science. I have to thank the critics of the Metaphysica for the reception accorded to it. There is only one remark which, as coming from an eminent philosopher, I would here advert to. He says in a letter to me that there can be no objection to the term Will, as I use it, if taken for Reason in activity. My position, however, is that Reason is itself the product of Will; that the moments of Will constitute Reason. Kants Vorstellung of Man is a rational being endowed with Will. The Metaphysica regards him as a being endowed with Will, and hence rational. In this, as in the former Treatise, I have laboured to be succinct, avoiding seductive byepaths of controversy as much as possible, with a view to concentrate attention on the main line of argument.
