Createspace Independent Publishing Platform, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.FOOD IS THE MOST BASIC OF HUMAN NEEDS so it is no wonder that the food industry is the largest industry in the world. Food production and distribution in the US are dominated by multinational corporations like Kraft, Nestle, Sysco, and General Mills, as well as restaurant chains that circle the globe. The industry employs millions of people, including home economists. These are highly trained professionals who are able to combine their passion for food, knack for science, and creative flair to create food that is delicious, healthy, safe, affordable, and interesting. This is a very diverse field that offers numerous career paths. Home economists conduct research and experiments in labs, cook up new recipes, design and test new kitchen equipment, determine what food policies best address public health and safety, demonstrate cooking techniques, and write about their favorite subject - food. With culinary skills and proper training, these professionals can become test kitchen cooks, research chefs, recipe developers, newspaper columnists, TV cooking show producers, food stylists, or food technologists. Because the food industry is massive, there is also an opportunity to specialize in certain foods or beverages, or specific kinds of employers. There is plenty of opportunity, particularly for those who are innovative and think outside the box. Major food companies, large media outlets, consulting firms, advertising agencies, universities, large restaurant chains, and government agencies are always looking for imaginative home economists. They all offer good salaries and job stability, as well as a chance to achieve great personal and professional satisfaction. Many home economists choose to freelance, obtaining projects through their network of contacts in the industry. For them, the pay is even greater than a salary would be, and...
