Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Education of the Pueblo Child, Vol. 7: A Study in Arrested Development A retrospective view of the evolution of culture as revealed in the history of ancient nations which have left written records, and the ethical remains of others which have disappeared, show a constantly recurring struggle in the progress of the adjustment of the individual to a group or social unit. The tragedy of nations has been involved in this adjustment. States have flourished, decayed or disintegrated in accordance with their success in meeting and solving this problem of individual freedom and social welfare. Extreme emphasis either on one or the other of these factors has proved disastrous to progress. On the one hand, it has led to national disintegration, and on the other, to intellectual stagnation. The problem is not yet solved by the most enlightened nations, but it is in the lower stages of civilization-that the crises are most marked. It appears that in the development of every people or nation emerging from barbarism there has been a time when these factors have been weighed in the balance, and the direction in which the beam has tipped has largely determined the destiny of that nation or people. In Greece it went in one direction, and in India, China and ancient Egypt in the other; and history has recorded the results. In the former is seen a comparatively short-lived but brilliant nation; in the latter, a stable, long-existing state, but at the expense of intellectual progress.
