Dear Reader, Have you wondered if humans will ever be able to make sense of human life? Will we ever be able to understand the fundamental logic of human life in clear terms that make rational sense? During my adolescent awakening, I became passionate about making rational sense of human life. But it was only after gaining competence in analytic thinking and in mathematic proofs, during my doctoral work in computer science, that I acquired the intellectual skills to realize this goal. Here are the five most fundamental problems that I solved. What is a human, and what is human life about? A human is a biological intelligent agent. That is, a human is a biological goal-processing system -- a system for creating and achieving goals. Human life is about skillfully achieving the high-level goals that are inherent in human nature. What is knowledge? Knowledge is our means for skillfully predicting our subjective observations so that we can skillfully achieve our goals. Is reality deterministic? I prove that determinism is logically impossible, and I show how to reason about reality under indeterminism. The proof is mathematic but is relatively simple. How does our mind work? I identify the main components and operations of the mind. I explain consciousness and define it objectively. And I review relevant psychology literature. Do we have freewill? I refute every notable challenge to freewill. A complete proof of freewill would characterize all possible challenges by category and then refute every category. I review relevant philosophy literature, and I show that the authors do not know how to reason about reality under indeterminism and they do not know how the mind works.
