CHAPTER II First Months In Paris In the spring of my fourteenth year, Father came to England and took Oscar and me to Paris. He had been having rather a bad time, financially, and as soon as I heard that it was impossible for him to keep me in school any longer, I was delighted. I said at once that I would go to work, and within a few days I secured a position at the Automobile Club. Going to and from work I had to pass Maxim s. I often coaxed the man to let me stand just inside the door to watch the dancing. So much music, so much light, so much perfume--that, and the sound of gliding feet--these are confused impressions that drift back to me now. Maxim s was the most wonderful, the most exquisite place in my small world, but the glimpses of dancing there made me long to see the other Parisian cafes. One evening at the Nouveau Cirque I stood in the doorway a long time watching some specially imported colored people do the cake-walk. The craze for this folk-dance was then at its height and I had already learned the fundamental steps. Over by the orchestra I saw the director in charge of the special dancers and I went to him. It took a lot of courage, but I suppose I had a good deal and, more than that, I had nerve--there is nothing in...
