CHAPTER XV MABEL JOYCE WHEN Rodney Elmore got back to his rooms it was somewhat late. Some letters were, on the table in his sitting-room, and a telegram from Stella Austin. One of those voluminous telegrams which women send when they are in no mood to consider that each unnecessary word means another halfpenny. It was, indeed, a little letter, in which she expressed both sympathy and disappointment. She was so sorry to hear the bad news about his uncle, and assured him--with apparent disregard of the fact that the message might possibly pass through several persons hands--that he had much better come to her if he was able, since she would console him as nobody else could. I shall be terribly disappointed if you do not come, it went on, so please do come. There are heaps of things I wish to say to you--simply heaps. So mind, Rodney,...
