The old brasses, dating from Gothic times, bore inscriptions in rhyming Latin, that Rutherford read and translated to his companion; there were monuments of a later time, adorned with urns, cherubs, and garlands--old trappings of death that made death itself seem almost quaint and charming. But in the seventeenth century the tranquil records of the scholars lives were disturbed by echoes of old war and exile. Reader, look to thy feet! Honest and Loyal men are sleeping under Thee, one inscription ran; and the name of more than one was recorded who, when Loyalty and the Church fainted, lay down and Died. Other monuments were put up to the memory of young men who had died at College. Well-born and modest, the old Latin described them, and dead, centuries ago, in the flower of their fruitless years. Vivere dulce fuit! one...
