Numerous possible causes can be suggested, but evidence is wanting that it is any of them. It would be interesting to know how general the relation between this changed rate of development and the degree of fertility is, but I have not been able to find any data in the literature that has any direct bearing upon the problem. Even though the rates of development be the same as can be made in experiment, the fertility never reaches the point found in the normal cross, so that there are other factors in addition to the Ac determiner that are not altered, or not enough, by the changed conditions of life so that fertility reaches the normal for the species. A point of interest in this connection is the interfertility of extracted F2 types, such as are derived from the crossings of these species. In the extracted types coming from the crossing of signaticollis and diversa, the degree of fertility is as high or higher than in either of the parent species. Comparison of the data shows clearly that there is relatively higher fertility in the F2 extractives, showing that there has been a change in the nature of the gametes by the reaction of crossing, and inhibition of uniform fertilization and development is removed by passage through the F1 reactions. A point of interest arises in this connection, namely, the increased interfertility between these extracted F2 stocks and the parent strains....
