Excerpt from The Language of the Ancient Egyptians and Its Monumental Records In the annals of philological research we seek in vain for a study that can lay juster claim to a first position, for any that has made more rapid and important progress in a short time than that of the Ancient Egyptian language. It was reserved to our century to solve the mystery of a language that had for more than one thousand years baffled the ingenuity and most searching inquiry of great men and scholars. Fifty years ago still witnessed the first beginnings of a science struggling for existence amid a chaos of opinions, while leaning for support on an unpretending black stone bearing a trilingual inscription. Yet this weak support was destined afterwards to become the very foundation of this study, and the discovery of this stone at Rosetta in 1799 inaugurated a new era in archaeological research and scientific investigation. Many years of labor passed before the correct alphabet was determined and then, with the help of Italian scholars, the Coptic was resuscitated from the darkness that was gathering around it, being then at the brink of utter decay. The Egyptian words were then carefully compared with the Coptic, and at last the meaning of words determined irrespective of the Greek translation of the Rosetta Stone, whose version was nevertheless fully corroborated. To one man above all belongs the honor of having watched over the early stages of the study with a jealous and loving eye, the illustrious founder of the science of Egyptology, Francois Champollion (1791-1835) At the time of his death the study had made a most remarkable progress and found worthy...
