Mr. Morris s prose romances have not yet been adequately appreciated, their deliberately archaised English being a stumbling-stone to many readers - though there are others who consider it, and, I think, rightly, an admirable and often beautiful medium for the stories Mr. Morris had to tell. It is to be found at its best in, The Wood beyond the World, and in, News from Nowhere, two of the loveliest fairy-tales ever written. Und nehmen wir schliesslich noch Conrad Hjalmar Nordbys Urteil in seiner Schrift The Influence of Old Norse Literature, New York 1901, S. 69: the two romances last mentioned [the House of the Wolfings und the Roots of Mountains] are so steeped in the atmosphere of the sagas, that what with folk-motes and shutbeds, and byres, and manquellers, and handsels and speech-friends, we seem to lose ourselves in yet another version of a northern tale. Morris retains the old idiom that he invented for his translations, and keeps the tyro thumbing his...
