Excerpt: . proportion than the impaired lives, his answer will quite probably be No. You may thus obtain unimpeachable evidence that various companies have not suffered appreciably by the lapse of good risks in undue proportion. A life company which retains its popularity does not, in fact, usually suffer on the score of vitality by reason of discontinuances It may have many lapses in the first year of insurance, but the medical examination is in such cases so recent that the risks remaining during the second year are on the whole unusually good, and the like holds true until the fourth or fifth year. After the third year the lapses in a popular life company are not so numerous, and those which do occur may be traced to one of three causes. The first cause is a change of circumstances, by which the policyholder finds himself unable to meet his premium payments. It is believed that lapses of this class occur in greater proportion among those risks which have become deteriorated in health or in habits, so that the net effect of such lapses is probably favorable. The second cause is that the beneficiary may die or be otherwise provided for, so that the insurance is no longer needed. Lapses from this cause may be presumed to occur in fairly uniform ratio among risks of all grades, and therefore to have little or no effect upon the quality of the risks remaining. The third cause...
