Excerpt from Manufacturing System Integration, Initial Architecture Document: September 1991 The Automated Manufacturing Research Facility (amrf) established in 1981, is a small batch3 manufacturing system testbed at the National Institute of Standards and Technology (nist) comprised of manufacturing equipment and systems designed to support research in computer integrated manufacturing. The concepts of hierarchical control for the factory and plug compatible interfaces for discrete factory systems were developed at this facility. Because of the disparate equipment on the shop floor, implementation efforts focused on physical integration of workstations, shop floor control, command and status protocols, communication and data access on the shop floor. This effort was successful in producing integrated workstations and obtained limited results in inter-workstation integration.
