Now I am sure, Sahib, that it was the Evil One that had put that collar about his neck for a reward of great wickedness. They considered the rice for a time, tasting it little by little, and then he with the collar cried a cry and they ate it all up, chattering and dancing about the fields. But they had not gratitude in their hearts for their good meal--and rice is not cheap in the hills this year. They knew. They knew, said his wife, quietly. They knew that we meant evil toward them. We should have given it as a peace-offering. Hanuman, the monkey-god, was angry with us. We should have made a sacrifice. They showed no gratitude at all, said the farmer, raising his voice. That very evening they overset and broke my pipe which I had left in the...
