When he did so, he thanked the Cure hurriedly, and declining the assistance which the good priest offered him in the belief that he was faint from marching in the heat, he hurried back towards the village. As he went, however, his eyes lighted on the old farmhouse, and he could not resist the yearning to take one last look at that well-remembered home before he left it behind him for ever. Once more he crossed the threshold, --once more he revisited each room, and stood awhile recalling to memory many a little incident that had happened there in bygone days. Last of all he took a farewell glance round the huge old attic where he himself had always slept, and as his eyes filled with tears that hindered him from seeing the dismal chilling look of...
