But a dreadful injury deprives him to pursue his dream anymore. He is now pointless over his future, perambulating and waiting for some rain to vanish his apathy. His friends came to visit after a long time. They met at their old school jam to revise the memoir. The conversation mounts on the route where Purvi's (Sameer's first crush) name comes up, and his mind strikes at that very moment. And a contradictory dream jolts his distraught mind. He again faces Purvi eventually at some party, but he gets a shock of paranoia when he sees Purvi in miserable condition. She was bearing the dreadful consequences of marriage. His cynic mind condemns him, accuses him for her poignant situation, because he didn't approach her at the first place and occupied himself in pursuit of fame. The contrived dagger of guilt tears his hollow conscious. He decided to wrap up his worthless life. But in the midst some suspicious takes entry! Ten some unprecedented happens and.

Reviews

Unquestionably, this is the best work by any author. Better than never, though I am quite late in starting to read this one. I realized this publication from my dad and I advised this PDF to find out.
