Createspace Independent Publishing Platform, 2016. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .5G - the next generation in mobile telephony - is heralded as a huge advance in global connectivity. But the vision is flawed. It is flawed because users will not value the higher data rates that are promised and will not need the higher capacity forecast. It is flawed because technological advances are insufficient to realise the vision and because mobile operators are insufficiently profitable to afford it. Yet it is not in the interests of any of the stakeholders to point this out. They all benefit from the interest, funding and potential that 5G promises. There is an alternative vision where industry focuses on consistent connectivity everywhere rather than ridiculously fast speeds in city centres. This short and easily digested book explains why the vision of 5G is flawed and sets out a better vision for a connected future. Chapter 1 examines the lessons of history, looking back at the transitions through previous generations and showing what simple extrapolations of trends would predict for 5G. It shows that if previous trends were followed, 5G would become widely deployed in 2022 and deliver realistic end-user data rates of 200Mbits/s and an increase in capacity of around 2x compared to current networks. Chapter 2 examines whether such increases in speed and capacity are needed. It shows that users do not value speeds above those already widely available on 4G. It demonstrates that while data requirements are currently growing rapidly, the rate of growth is slowing and if extrapolated will result in a plateau in data rate requirements around 2027, with little growth in the 5G era. Hence, it concludes that the advances in speed and capacity that 5G might bring are not...
