Excerpt from Waltham Occupying a territory naturally well adapted to meet requirements for residences and so developed as to be no less well suited to serve as locations for large or small industrial enterprises, the City of Waltham is in Middlesex County, about ten miles from Boston and a little north of a line running due west from the larger city. The more thickly settled parts of Waltham are near its southern boundary; here, also, and within a short distance of the Charles, in its course of three miles or so through city, are the important business houses and the plants of the manufacturing establishments for which Waltham has become so notably distinguished. Here the characteristics are distinctly urban and the residents enjoy the conveniences and facilities of a well equipped modern city. To the north and west of this part of Waltham, and within its geographical limits of fourteen square miles, is a large area in which more rural conditions prevail.
