Economic Growth and Development in China

By Vivien Gröning

GRIN Verlag Jan 2010, 2010. Taschenbuch. Book Condition: Neu. 210x148x2 mm. This item is printed on demand - Print on Demand Neuware - Seminar paper from the year 2006 in the subject Business economics - Miscellaneous, grade: -, University of Hamburg, language: English, abstract: If the need for a Big Push survives in an economy that is open to international trade and capital movements, or if openness to trade and capital movements is sufficient to overcome all poverty traps, these questions have daunted development economics since its inception (Jaime et al. 1997). In the last two hundred years, every country with high development and productivity rates has industrialised. While in the eighteenth century Britain, and in the twentieth century Korea and Japan grew rich, other countries remained poor. One of the discussed causes for this underdevelopment might be the small domestic market. While the idea started with Rosenstein-Rodan (1943)¹, who thought the solution would be aid and investment programs, since the 1960s advocates tend to the idea that openness of the economy resolves the problem of a small domestic market. The theory is that openness would induce an export-led Big Push in terms of simultaneous growth over different sectors (Murphy...
