Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Journal of the Bacon Society: Containing Also the First Annual Report; August, 1887 In speaking of qualities attributable to the poet, possessed by Bacon, I would, desire to refer to One not very usually, I must admit, associated in the minds Of men with poetry, but which I believe to be an invariable attribute of every poet who has really commanded, apart from the fashions and phantasies of the hour, the sympathies of the English speaking races; I mean a sort of divine common sense, a sweet reasonableness, if I may employ the words of an eminent critic, himself a poet. This quality I cannot more particularly define in better language than in the words of Macaulay as applied to Bacon In the temper Of Bacon, he says, there was a singular union of audacity and sobriety.
