Lenore rose up at morning red From heavy dreams of anguish: Art faithless, William, or art dead? How long wilt let me languish? He with King Frederick s warlike might At Prague had march d into the fight, And had no tidings given Of how his luck had thriven. The empress and her royal foe In fury now relented, And, tired of warfare and of woe, To peace at length consented. And both the hosts with song and cheer, With clash and clang in glad career, Adorned with sprigs and flowers, Returned to homes and bowers. And everywhere, o er hill and dale, By road and stile and turning, Did young and old exulting hail The shouts of the returning. Thank Heaven! wives and children cried, And Welcome! many a happy bride; Alas! for poor Lenore Nor kiss nor bliss was more. She ran along with fear distraught, Ask d each in swift succession; Alas, not one could tell her aught In all that long procession. And when at last the train had pass d Upon the ground herself she cast, Her raven tresses tearing, Desponding and despairing. Her mother cried in fond dismay: Lord! Mercy on my daughter! My child, how is it with thee? Say! And in her arms she caught her. Oh, mother, what is gone is gone! Farewell to world and all anon! God has no pity for me, Woe, woe alone hangs o er me!...
