It is just this possibility of promiscuous use that has caused some interests to be antagonistic to the principle of the many-trip package. There is a deep prejudice in some fields against even a remote possibility of substitution. This feeling would cause opposition to any proposal to repeatedly send back for replenishment a distinctive form of container. In their investigation of the slack-filling of packages, government officials found that a considerable proportion of the firms that were following this practice were not in sympathy with the idea, but they felt compelled to follow the plan because competitors were doing so.
