Excerpt from James Abram Garfield: A Discourse in Memoriam How often, since only one short year ago when he was before us for our suffrages, on through his induction into office, his opening administration, and these weeks of heroism, have we gone over, with tearful surprise and pride, the contrasts and progress of that life, so beyond any fiction in the pathos of its early struggles, the splendor of its mid-day achievement, and the immortal patience of its untimely close. Alas! It is a dreadful loss we have met; yet happy the people that has the story of such a life to form, till earth's latest generation, the lesson-book of its children.
