Excerpt from The Yale Literary Magazine, Vol. 18: August, 1853 The College world furnishes a soil eminently adapted to the growth of reputations. There are some huge plants and some tremendous specimens occasionally produced, considering the size of the garden Reputation seems to be easier attained, to be aspired after more, and to gain more here than in almost any other quarter. Character here sometimes obtains its strict due, but by no means always. Reputation often either shoots far ahead of it, or falls far behind. The advent of many to this microcosm is ushered in by the trumpeting of fame. These favorite children of renown - who dares dispute their claims? The whisperings of report proclaim them great, and great they are. Imaginary laurels crown their brows. There seems to stand forth in bold relief upon their foreheads, the terrible, awful mark, which brands them as distinguished. They set their sails - take the helm-and, waited by the breezes of fame and reputation sail calmly down the river of College life. Look out, my friends, your bark may not be strong enough to encounter the waves of the ocean beyond. How many are there of these smart men! How many are there who could if they would! How many young volcanoes are there whose fires are only sleeping Sometimes these fires break forth - the thunders roar, and the mountain heaves - and then succeeds a calm. Some gain reputation, as twere, by the Fabian policy, or by a masterly inactivity. To come forth boldly and openly on the field of action, and take decided steps - would, mayhap, discover their failings, and disclose their wants. The plan...
